Crystal Future OÜ and BikiniOff

Crystal Future OÜ, the same company behind several of Kapsis's skin-gambling sites, is named as the operator of BikiniOff, an app that turns ordinary photos of people into fake nude images.

What BikiniOff does

BikiniOff let users upload a photo of any person and get back a convincing fake nude image, known as a deepnude. It spread mainly as a Telegram bot and became popular with very young users.

The original report also showed a censored sample image from BikiniOff's own marketing. It is left out here because it is a fake nude of a real person whose age cannot be confirmed.

The Italian investigations

After the app reached school classrooms, the Lazio Childhood Guarantor received repeated reports about it. Two young men, aged 18 and 20, were accused of using the Telegram bot to make fake nude images of underage schoolmates, which led to child pornography charges. The court dismissed the case, citing immaturity rather than malicious intent and noting that neither had a prior record. A third boy was under 14, below the age of criminal responsibility. The app and its distribution channels remain under heavy scrutiny.

BikiniOff has an English-language interface, it was born in Europe and from the site it is evident that it is aimed at an international audience, however this disturbing application has been talked about practically only in Italy and the few international sources that have covered the subject still refer to the news case that involved a high school in the province of Rome. Let's start right there.

They use an app to "undress" their classmates and end up under investigation for child pornography: two 14-year-old Italians in trouble

The topic of deepnude has entered the radar of the Italian information in recent days, after the conclusion of an investigation opened last August on two boys as young as 14 years old. The accusation (fortunately, for them, already dismissed) was very serious: "they produced and disseminated child pornography material".

Terms of use: no consent, moderation or age checks

An archived copy of BikiniOff's user agreement does not:

- require users to prove they own the rights to an image, or have consent from the person in it
- describe any moderation, flagging or abuse reporting
- include age checks to stop the tool being used on minors

With none of these safeguards, the tool is open to use against real people, including minors.

Evidence that Crystal Future OÜ runs BikiniOff

An archived, now-deleted version of bikinioff.net lists Crystal Future OÜ as the copyright holder, with a Tallinn address. The same company name opens the site's user agreement, which identifies it as administrator of the whole service, including the Telegram bot.

The PUBG domain case

A WIPO panel ordered pubg.com transferred from Kapsis and Crystal Future OÜ to PUBG Corporation after finding it was registered in bad faith (WIPO decision D2018-0366).

- The respondents acquired pubg.com shortly after PUBG Corporation released PlayerUnknown's Battlegrounds.
- In March 2017, PUBG Corporation, owner of the "PUBG" trademark, complained that the domain falsely suggested a link to its brand.
- The respondent claimed to run a non-commercial fan site. The panel rejected this, citing the identical domain name, the use of PUBG's logo and a misleading registration history.

Conclusion

Crystal Future OÜ, headquartered in Tallinn and owned by Theodotos Kapsis, is far more than a shell company. It sits inside a multi-million-dollar gambling network that includes CSGO.Market, CSGONet, GGDrop, TopSkin.cc, FantaMaster, SlotsCity, CSGOFast and GainSkins, much of it aimed at young, gaming-focused users.

The same company is named as copyright holder of the deleted bikinioff.net site and as administrator in its user agreement, which makes it responsible for the Telegram bot now under scrutiny. Taken together, the evidence suggests that the corporate structure behind high-revenue gambling platforms is also used to run an AI tool that enables non-consensual sexual images, including of children. That overlap raises serious ethical and legal concerns about whether profits from one business are funding the other.
